The Cotswolds AONB HLC dataset records this land as assrats cut from the ancient woodland that exists in the nearby area. Whilst this is possible, it seems more likely that the fields represent piecemeal enclosure of open fields that surround Eastrip hamlet.

These modern enclosures have been created by combining the more numerous piecemeal fields shown here on the 1 ed 6" OS map. These former fields remain legible and ridge and furrow on APs suggests the presence of even earlier strip fields here.

Full Description

The modern aerial photographs show traces of ridge and furrow in the central part of this area. This suggests the piecemeal fields of the post medieval era consolidated earlier strips which formed part of an open field system. These strips may have had Saxon/medieval origins.

Enclosures here are only loosely defined in modernity - character could equally be described as grassland. Seems like enough organisation/management to refer to them as fields though.

Full Description

Whilst the current settlement occupies the same area as the one shown on the historic OS mapping there is not enough survival of historic form and character to record this as settlement with a continuity of character. Therefore the present day hamlet and the historic one have been recorded separately as the current and previous landscape types accordingly.

There are some small pockets of woodland in this area but they do not affect the dominant meadow character here.

These meadows have formed as a consequence of By Brook running through this area.

Full Description

As little of the historic form and character of the settlement shown on the historic mapping survives, the current and former hamlet have been recorded separately as the current/previous character types.
